CAMPAIGN FOR A NEW SURGICAL FACILITY

Meet our
Honorary Co-Chairs

This is our hospital
Yesterday. Today. Tomorrow.

Wake Forest Baptist Health and Lexington Medical Center are empowering a community-driven campaign to create a partnered investment in health care that will resonate throughout our region for decades.

Our new surgical facility will provide modern, technologically advanced and comfortable surgical space. To reach our goal, we will rely on private philanthropic contributions and an element that has sustained us for generations: community pride and support.

Our community deserves the best and most modern setting for receiving the best care.

Join us in fulfilling this challenge.

Tim and Teen Timberlake's connections to Lexington Medical Center run long and deep.

Tim's grandfather and two uncles gave the land where the original Lexington Hospital was built on Weaver Drive. Teen's father, Dr. Dan Redwine, was a longtime general practitioner in the community who spent many days and nights at the hospital.

Four of the Timberlakes' five children had tonsillectomies performed at the old hospital—all at the same time. In recent years, the Timberlakes have relied on the Medical Center for multiple knee and hip replacement surgeries between them.

The Timberlakes' deep sense of commitment to what they see as a vital cog in the community makes it easy for them to support the campaign for a new surgical facility.

"The Medical Center is so important to the overall welfare of our community," says Tim, who has been a longtime member of the Medical Center's board of directors and served as the first president of the Lexington Medical Center Foundation. "It's one of the engines that makes the community run, along with the schools, the community college and other entities. It all makes for a vibrant community."

Says Teen, "I've always felt that if you live in a community, it's important to support that community. This will be a meaningful addition and a wonderful asset to have in place. I hope we won't have to use it, but I'll be glad it's there."

Thompson and Kristie Miller see today as a defining moment for Lexington Medical Center.

Armed with his Wake Forest law degree and her MBA from UNC Greensboro, they have served their community through the YMCA board of directors, as members of the vestry at Grace Episcopal Church and on the Domestic Violence Board, a forerunner to Family Services of Davidson County.

Today: Thompson and Kristie Miller

Thompson was treated as a child at the original Lexington Hospital and has had outpatient surgeries at today's Medical Center. He also performed legal work for the Medical Center before joining its Foundation board as his career was winding down. He's now completing his final year as chairman of the board of directors.

The Millers have endured Kristie's open-heart surgery, their son's successful leukemia treatment and her father's valiant battle with cancer—all with care provided elsewhere.

"It would've been so much better to have had that care available in our community," Kristie says. "This facility will really open up possibilities for more and different surgeries that are not offered now. Surgeons coming out of training now want to work in a setting that is state-of-the-art, so this will help attract good surgeons to our community."

Says Thompson, "We've seen all of the improvements made over the past 10 years and have always held Lexington Medical Center in high regard. To us, supporting this effort and this investment is a no-brainer."

Although still young parents, Michael and Meg Holshouser have seen the difference quality health care makes.

Both of their sons were born at Lexington Medical Center in experiences that Meg describes as “better than great.” They’ve also relied on orthopaedic care, as one rambunctious son has broken both collarbones and Michael and Meg have each suffered broken hands.

“All of those experiences give us confidence in telling others about the Medical Center,” says Meg, a CPA who works with the nonprofit Life Center of Davidson County and has been active with Communities in Schools.

“As a family, we’re interested in the big picture of the Medical Center and how it serves the community as a whole. We want to make sure we have the best care for people of all ages, from babies and small kids like our own to our parent’s generation and their needs. It means having the latest technology available and having care that’s as efficient as possible.”

Michael works in commercial lending with Pinnacle Financial Partners and serves on the board of the YMCA. He says supporting the campaign for a new surgical facility makes sense on multiple levels.

“It benefits us and our boys and the whole community for the Medical Center to be the best it can be,” he says. “This is also an opportunity to help attract the best doctors who want to work in a top-tier setting, and when people are looking to bring new businesses to the county, it helps to have a great hospital system in place.”
